MENTILE APPEALS Which that can be so surely effected, From the N. O. Picayuna.

At the door of his leafy palace A Firs-fly one night Stood trimming his little lantern, And watching the stars so bright.

"What large, splendid lamps they carry, White mine is so small and dim; What good does it do, I wonder, And why was it lit by Him?"

1 polish it every morning. And I trim it every night. But its scarcely worth the trouble, it gives such a feeble light. And he turned to the Fire-fly lady With a curr of discontent, She pauses in her kousehold duties To list to the sad lament.

"My ismp," said the oright little lady,
"Is dimmer than yours, but I'
Ne'er wish for the flaming lanterns
That shine in the far off sky," "It is bright enough for my using, For it lights up our little home; And it cheers you to see it shining When for in the dark you rosm."

Just then on the leaf-roof sianting A large, heavy drop of rain Fell, rocking the little palace, Till 'twas almost rent in twain, They peeped through the open window, Aff the tar-lamps had gone cut. And the wind, with its wide wings open Was fanning the clouds about.

Our neighbors, the Ant and Beetle, Passed late by our door to-day To slean in the gramy meadow, I am sure they have lost the way.

"I must hasten to gu'de them safely: At the window, love, remain," Said the lord of the little pa'ace, To light me home back again. When trionming his lantern quickly, He covered it close with his wing. And flew through the rain and darkness, Borne up by the All-Seeing.

He flew to the North, and flew to the South, And flew to the East and West, Thi he found the poor blind beetle Ensnared in a spider's nest. And the weak little ant was swimming Half-drowned through a drop of rain but he shood on the nearest landing. And lighted him o'er the main.

Then flashing his lantern brightly, His guided them on their way. Till be came to the kingdom of heeties, And the village of anis that lay Two steps from the Fire-dy city; Then bidding them both adon, Straight home to the lifted window— To nis lady-love he flew.

Subscriptions are solicited to this work, which, when compiled, will embrace between four and five huddred 12 mo. pages, printed upon calendered paper in bold, dear type, and bound in a creditable manner. Gen. HASKELL was one of the most brilliant men and eloquent crators that Tennessee has ever given to our common country. This will be shown not only by a brist and truthful narrative of the chief incidents of his eventful life, but by presenting the reader with his Remains, consisting of Foems, Essays, Letters and Orations
